For the purpose of this study, we selected 100 randomly selected participants (50 females and 50 males) from the University of Illinois at Chicago (UIC) and the University of Illinois at Chicago (UIC) to participate in the study. The participants were recruited from the UIC community and were compensated for their participation. The study was approved by the Institutional Review Boards (IRB) of both universities. The participants were informed of the purpose of the study and their rights as research subjects. They were also informed that their participation was voluntary and that they could withdraw from the study at any time without any negative consequences. The participants were then assigned to one of two groups: the experimental group and the control group. The experimental group consisted of 50 participants, and the control group consisted of 50 participants. The participants in the experimental group were exposed to the intervention, while the participants in the control group were not. The intervention was delivered by a trained research assistant. The participants in the experimental group were also asked to complete a questionnaire at the end of the study. The questionnaire was designed to measure the participants' knowledge, attitudes, and beliefs regarding the intervention. The data from the questionnaire were then analyzed to determine the effectiveness of the intervention. The results of the study are presented in the following sections.
